PROGRAM OVERVIEW
As international and terrorism crimes have significantly escalated in recent decades, national and international justice systems have wrestled with questions about the best forum and methods of prosecuting these crimes. Because terrorism and other international crimes affect international relations and domestic politics, there are political debates over the proper criminal jurisdiction to adjudicate these cases. Because these crimes can be particularly difficult to investigate and prosecute, there are significant practical questions about which tribunals are most competent and effective to hear the cases, and what are the best practices for uncovering evidence and securing convictions.

This symposium takes up these questions, examining terrorism crimes and international criminal law and tribunals through a series of panels. Participants will discuss examples of recent and notable terrorism prosecutions, whether terrorism and international crimes should be prosecuted in domestic or international courts, and available resources and difficulties with gathering evidence for the prosecution of these crimes. Participants will focus, in particular, on protecting the integrity and effectiveness of the investigative process and legal proceedings when prosecuting terrorism crimes.
